The 2022-23 Academic Year was a big one for the Department of History. At the top of the list is the $1 million Mellon grant led by Professors Katrina Jagodinsky, Jeannette Jones, and Will Thomas. This grant, the largest ever won in the department and in the Humanities at UNL, builds a nationally important cluster for legal research on race and American history. It got off the ground in Spring 2023 and in Fall 2023 it will launch a major teaching and research initiative in the department in collaboration with the College of Law and other entities at UNL and in Lincoln. Other major grants were won in the department and numerous books and articles were published this year. More information about the research and accomplishments of the faculty are detailed below.

Granting tenure and promoting faculty is perhaps the most important work we do as a department, and this year Professors Dawne Curry and Bedross Der Matossian were both successfully promoted to full professors. A specialist in South African history and a joint appointee at the Institute for Ethnic Studies, Professor Curry’s latest book is Social Justice at Apartheid’s Dawn: African Women Intellectuals and the Quest to Save the Nation (2022). She joined our department in 2006. A leading authority on the Armenian genocide, Professor Der Matossian’s latest books are Horrors of Adana: Revolution and Violence in the Early Twentieth Century (2022) and Denial of Genocides in the Twenty-First Century (Ed. 2023). He joined our department in 2010 and is the Hymen Rosenberg Professor in Judaic Studies. I am especially delighted that they have made it to the highest level of the professoriate.

Our department graduated 4 Ph.D. students (Donna Rae Devlin, Anthony Allan Foreman, Patrick Tyler Hoehne, and Kenneth Larry Knotts, Jr.; see p. 31) and 1 M.A. student (Jeffrey Gilbert), and 12 undergraduate students with degrees in history.

Sadly, I regret the necessity of writing that our department lost one of its most distinguished emeriti professors this summer, Professor John Wunder. Professor Wunder received his J.D. from the University of Iowa and Ph.D. from the University of Washington. He joined the department in 1988 and had served as the Director of the Center for Great Plains Studies. A leading scholar of the American West, Professor Wunder created a dynamic and vibrant American West program at UNL and trained dozens of Ph.D.s in our department. A towering figure, he is sorely missed by my colleagues and friends.

As you browse this year’s Annual Report, I hope you will appreciate the strengths and accomplishments of our faculty and students. We can do this work only with your sustained backing for our department. Thank you for your continued support.

With respect and kind wishes,

Samuel Clark Waugh Distinguished Professor & Chair of the Department of History
A former member of the Richard Nixon presidential administration delivered the 2022 Pauley Lecture presentation on 8 Sept. 2023.

For the presentation, "Reflections on Nixon's Presidency," John Roy Price, who worked with Nixon on several social policies, had a discussion with Thomas (Tim) Borstelmann, E.N. and Katherine Thompson Professor of Modern World History, about his experiences in the administration and share some of the themes of his memoir, The Last Liberal Republican: An Insider’s Perspective on Nixon’s Surprising Social Policy.

Price earned his bachelor's degree at Grinnell College, Iowa, and went on to earn his master's in philosophy, politics, and economics from Oxford University as a Rhodes Scholar. He completed a law degree from Harvard Law School and practiced law in New York. Price co-founded the Republican policy group, the Ripon Society, which led to involvement in the presidential campaigns of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York, and then Richard Nixon.

Price served as Special Assistant to the President for Urban Affairs in Nixon's first term. Price worked with Nixon on the president's social policies, including welfare reform, hunger, and nutrition, and Nixon's 1971 proposal for a national health insurance program.

Following that work, Price returned to New York and a career in finance, and now lives in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and in Livingston, Montana.

The Pauley Lecture is organized in memory of University of Nebraska–Lincoln alumnus Carroll R. Pauley (class of 1930). Pauley was a lifelong Nebraskan who served in the U.S. Navy during World War II and had a passion for history. He died in Lincoln in 1987.

The 2022 James A. Rawley Graduate Conference in the Humanities: War and Genocide was inspired by recent geopolitical crises in Eastern Europe, and focused on themes of the Holocaust in public memory and education, European and North American contexts of war and sexual violence, the plight of refugees and forced migrants, and public responses to war. The conference was held 12-13 October 2022, and included four panels, three workshops, and a keynote address by Dr. Omer Bartov of Brown University who discussed the importance of Holocaust remembrance.

The hybrid format of the conference allowed graduate students, educators, community leaders, and university professors from across the country to present their work and promote enriched dialogue and outreach. Participants came from Northwestern University, Indiana University-Bloomington, Grinnell College, College of Saint Mary, Winthrop University, University of Iowa, University of Nebraska-Lincoln, University of Nebraska-Omaha, the Asian Community and Cultural Center, and Institute for Holocaust Education (IHE).

The 2022 Rawley Conference would not have been successful without generous sponsors whose contributions made the conference possible: The Department of History; the UNL Research Council; the UNL Faculty Senate; UNL Convocation Committee; the Harris Center for Judaic Studies; the Forsthy Family Program on Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs; the History Graduate Student Association; UNL Department of Sociology; the Center for Great Plains Studies; UNL Department of Ethnic Studies; and the UNL Department of Modern Languages.

Hello! My name is Dr. Angel Hinzo and I’m looking forward to joining the University of Nebraska Lincoln’s History department and Institute for Ethnic Studies this fall. I am a citizen of the Winnebago Tribe of Nebraska and have Mexican-American heritage on my father’s side. My experience growing up as a Ho-Chunk person in predominantly non-Native spaces inspired me to pursue the study of Native American history. I completed my B.A. in U.S. History at the University of California, San Diego and went on to complete my Ph.D. in Native American Studies with a Designated Emphasis in Feminist Theory and Research from the University of California, Davis. I was a postdoc fellow in Interdisciplinary Indigenous Studies at the University of Denver and was previously an Assistant Professor of Ethnic Studies at the University of San Diego. I am excited to now have the opportunity to live and work in the heartland – the region where my research is based.

My research is primarily archival and focused on U.S. federal Indian policy eras. My work engages with tribal and family histories to understand how Native American communities have resisted and managed the legal fictions of the United States. I will be further developing a book manuscript that focuses on Ho-Chunk history in addition to other writing projects this year. This fall I am excited to teach one of my favorite subjects: Native American Women. I am also teaching Introduction to Native American History which will dive into the diversity of experiences of Indigenous people in the Americas.

I am Dr. Carolyn Twomey and I am a medievalist whose research focuses on the history of religious conversion and material objects and architectures of the early Middle Ages in Europe. Originally from New Hampshire, I have an interdisciplinary scholarly background in history, art history, archaeology, and religious studies and have been teaching for the past few years at St Lawrence University in rural northern New York State. I completed my B.A. at the Catholic University of America and my graduate degrees at the University of York, UK, and Boston College.

I explore what material objects and places, specifically the stone sculpture and environmental waterscapes of churches (and their 3D models), can tell us about the popular religion of everyday women and men in the Early Middle Ages. This July, shortly after moving across the country with three cats to Lincoln, I presented research from the fourth chapter of my book project, Living Water, Living Stone: A Material History of Baptism in Early Medieval England, at the International Medieval Congress at the University of Leeds. The paper addressed the overlapping sacred and secular roles that consecrated baptismal fontwater played in tenth-century Old English medical manuscripts. A typical archival visit for me frequently involves driving on the wrong side of the road in Britain and Ireland to study early medieval parish churches and lifting baptismal font covers older than the USA.

One of my goals at UNL is to further develop my active and experiential pedagogy on campus. My students bring the premodern past closer to the present by reenacting Viking funerals and historical plagues, blending medieval ink from oak galls, and getting hands-on with the parchment of illuminated manuscript leaves. My background as a museum intern, tour guide, and park ranger also encourages me to learn more about the local history of Nebraska, UNL, and the Lincoln-Omaha area itself.

I am extremely happy to be joining this community of scholars at UNL and meeting new colleagues, and I encourage folks to reach out for a coffee or tea at the Mill. My Minnesotan husband and I have already had a warm Midwestern welcome to Nebraska and are excited to explore Lincoln’s bike trails, sample its food culture, and root for college football for the first time.
The primary reason we need this project is that, for the most part, Americans and American students are exposed to only a thin slice of American cases in history, "said Thomas, Angle Chair in the Humanities and professor of history. "There are a few landmark cases that students encounter. But think of the thousands of courthouses around the United States. This is the biggest set of historical evidence that’s untapped in American history. We want to bring it into the light, share it, and talk about it."

The initiative also represents one of the university’s most significant efforts to develop team teaching, both among history faculty and in partnership with law faculty and external scholars. Prior efforts to do this have been popular and eye-opening for students, who are able to better see how their studies fit into a broader context…

Other collaborators from the College of Law include Genetics Agosto [UNI History M.A./J.D., May 2022], Eric Berger, Danielle Jefferis, and (not pictured) Catherine Wilson, will establish an academic program that enables undergraduate and graduate students to study how various marginalized groups in American history used the law to contest and advance their rights. "A lot of these conversations are already happening at the graduate instructional level," said Jagodinsky, Susan J. Rosewski Associate Professor of history. "We are distinguishing ourselves by the extent to which we bring the research and teaching to the undergraduate level."

To create the resource, Thomas, Jagodinsky, and Jones will build on their existing projects at the Center for Digital Research in the Humanities, which have already made accessible thousands of unpublished legal cases. These include: freedom suits by enslaved people; habeas corpus cases filed by women, children, and others; and information about racial-legal categories in the U.S. and abroad, particularly Africa. They’ll also leverage existing open-access collections and select digital media objects for inclusion.

The repository will include the voices and perspectives of people and communities directly affected by this history. With community partners Vision Maker Media and the Institute of Politics, Policy, and History at the University of the District of Columbia, the team will produce multimedia content, including documentaries focused on a case or historical event. Michæl Burton, assistant professor of textiles, merchandising and fashion design, and Kwakwul Drehn, associate professor of English, of the Animating History team will also contribute their expertise in creative storytelling.

"In every jurisdiction we have looked at as researchers, we have found concerns about race and gender," Jagodinsky said. "We want to bring this history to the broader public and help people become comfortable with engaging these materials directly and seeing them as part of the evolution of law in the United States."

Aaron Douglas Professorship

Nine University of Nebraska-Lincoln professors have been awarded professorships from the Office of the Executive Vice Chancellor. "These exceptional members of our faculty are doing big things, and I am grateful they call Nebraska home," said Katherine Ankerson, executive vice chancellor. "Their research, teaching, and service is changing lives, not just our students, but the lives of each other and society…"

Two faculty members were named Aaron Douglas/John E. Weaver professor. The professorship was established in 2008 to recognize faculty members with the rank of full professor who demonstrate sustained and extraordinary levels of teaching excellence and national visibility for instructional activities and/or practice. Vanessa Gorman will be Aaron Douglas professor in history and in classics and religious studies.

Gorman conducts research into digital approaches to language analysis and categorization, which has contributed to new approaches for teaching Greek and other classic languages. Her instruction builds upon her expertise—exploring new tools to help students gain proficiency in ancient languages. Within the history department, she is described as one of its best and most impactful instructors who provides students with “rich windows” into ancient civilizations. She has two published monographs, an edited book, and nine peer-reviewed journal articles or chapters. Gorman has received numerous accolades for
The University of Nebraska-Lincoln will award promotion and/or tenure to 93 faculty in 2023.

Faculty receiving honors are listed below and at 2023 Promotion and Tenure.

Promoted to Professor
- Dawne Y. Curry, History & Ethnic Studies
- Bedross Der Matossian, History

The Department of History heartily congratulates Professors Curry and Der Matossian on this major career milestone.

Dr. Carole Levin (Professor Emerita) and share the news regarding the publication of her latest book: The Reign and Life of Queen Elizabeth I: Politics, Culture, and Society. The new book provides an overview of politics, culture, and society during the reign of Elizabeth I. The book offers an introduction to Elizabeth's reign, while also providing useful detail for those already familiar. It was published by Palgrave-Macmillan and is available in paperback via https://link.springer.com/book/10.1007/978-3-030-93009-7.

Dr. Levin also did a book launch to promote her publication on 23 September 2022 at Francie & Finch Bookshop.

The Harris Center for Judaic Studies hosted the book launch for Bedross Der Matossian’s Denial of Genocides in the Twenty-First Century on 10 May 2023 in the Chimney Rock Room of Nebraska Union.

Der Matossian edited the volume, which was published 1 May 2023 with Nebraska University Press. The book explores the denial of eight genocides through chapters written by scholars of those events. The launch included a panel discussion covering the book’s themes. Panelists were: Der Matossian; Gerald Steinacher, Rawley Professor of History and contributor to the book; and Ari Kohen, director of the Harris Center and professor of political science…

In the 21st century, where information – and disinformation – is shared at warp speed, genocide denialism has spread just as rapidly.

Bedross Der Matossian, a historian of the Armenian Genocide and professor of history at the University of Nebraska–Lincoln, is aiming to help explain this phenomenon and combat it with a new volume of scholarship from fellow historians that he’s edited into the book, Denial of Genocides in the Twenty-First Century.

Through state and nonstate propaganda efforts, the weaponization of publications by pseudo-historians, and the rise of social media, genocide denialism has entered the mainstream, Der Matossian said, bringing with it a rise in racism, antisemitism, and other xenophobias.

“It’s a very timely book, I think, with the rise of right-wing governments around the globe, with the rise of white nationalism in the United States, antisemitism, and with the Turkish government’s excessive propaganda after the 100th anniversary of the Armenian genocide that took place in 2015,” he said.

Der Matossian said the book is an important contribution to the scholarship surrounding genocides in modern history, but it is also important because denialism is a revictimization of those killed and the survivors, and has wide-ranging unforeseen consequences.

“Scholars argue that the last stage of a genocide is denial,” he said. “Denial is killing the dead, killing the memory of dead, and many survivors live with the denial of their own genocide. The denial of genocides emboldens people to commit additional acts of violence and genocide in the future.”

In chronological order, 12 scholars including Der Matossian write about denialism of eight genocides spanning three centuries. Der Matossian said he asked scholars to contribute based on their expertise as historians of particular genocides. Among the contributors is Der Matossian’s colleague, Gerald Steinacher, James A. Rawley Professor of History, who wrote a chapter about Holocaust denial.

Chapters cover the denialism of the Armenian genocide, genocides of the Indigenous in the United States, the Holocaust, genocides in Cambodia, Guatemala, Bosnia, Rwanda, and the genocide in Syria under the Assad regime. The final chapter is written by Israel Charney, a psychologist and genocide scholar, and explains why some engage in denialism.

“These are examples of major genocides, in order to show why the 21st century is a new phase in denialism,” Der Matossian said. “It endeavors to understand the new methods of denialism that are taking place around the globe.”

While the genocides covered in the book happened, in some cases, centuries or decades ago, Der Matossian noted that the lightning speed with which information is shared today makes it harder to overcome the disinformation.

“Both state and nonstate actors obfuscate the reality through using the medium of social networks, the most important being Facebook, Twitter, and YouTube, by putting their propaganda material there, and we see an increase in Armenophobia, Islamophobia, antisemitism,” he said. “All of them are using the 21st century tools to operate and to reach their agenda.”

The volume also raises awareness that genocide denialism does not end, even when countries have accepted responsibility, and it demonstrates that that denialism does not only happen under authoritarian regimes.

“There is no genocide in the course of history that has gone without being denied by states and nonstate actors, often including ‘professional’ historians and pseudo-historians… In the past decade, the rise of right-wing populist governments in Europe and the United States has intensified this trend dramatically,” Der Matossian writes in the introduction.

Der Matossian also challenges his readers to ask themselves what can be done.

“In the United States, the denial of genocide is hiding behind the First Amendment,” he said. “We invite the reader also to raise a question whether denial of genocide should be termed as hate speech.”

BOOK ON CHINESE GOVERNMENT PUBLISHED

The Collapse of Nationalist China: How Chiang Kai-shek Lost China’s Civil War, by Parks Coble, has been published by Cambridge University Press.

Coble is James L. Sellers Professor in the Department of History whose research field is 20th century China with an emphasis on the political history of Republican China (1911-1949), the history of Chinese business in the 20th century; and Sino-Japanese interactions…

He had first contacted an editor at Cambridge University Press in November of 2021, submitting a prospectus with a proposed table of contents and a sample chapter. Lucy Rhymer, a senior editor, replied that she was interested so Coble submitted a draft of the manuscript. As is normally the case with university presses, she submitted the work to two readers whose identity was shielded from him.

Finding the readers and getting them to complete their reviews promptly can be difficult for presses. It is nerve wracking for the author as the process drags out. Coble was delighted when he received the two anonymous reports in early March 2022. Both were very favorable and recommended publication. Rhymer concurred and forwarded the recommendation to the board of the press. Coble received a contract in April. But much work remained. Although favorable, both readers had suggested some changes in the work, so made extensive revisions. He submitted the final manuscript in June 2022, and then worked with a global team. Coble’s copy editor was in the United States; the typesetting and layout was done in India. A production manager in Cambridge coordinated the process, including working with him on the index and footnote style. Cambridge University Press has an arrangement with Getty Images, which has a vast collection of photographs. After lengthy searching, Coble and the editor agreed on ten black-and-white photographs for the text as well as an additional one for the cover. The final printing occurred in Great Britain with publication in both printed and electronic versions.

This study is the conclusion of almost a decade of research and writing. Coble made nearly a dozen trips to China, many attending academic conferences organized by Professor Wu Jingping of the History Department of Fudan University in Shanghai. Coble was able to present his research findings to a Chinese academic audience, which brought invaluable feedback. The archives of the Hoover Institution at Stanford University were a second key source. In several trips, he worked in a number of key collections available archival sources, he reveals the critical weakness.

From the publisher: “When World War II ended Chiang Kai-shek seemed at the height of his power—the leader of Nationalist China, one of the victorious Allied Powers in 1945 and with the financial backing of the US. Yet less than four years later, he lost the China’s civil war against the communists. Offering an insightful chronological treatment of the years 1944–1949, Parks Coble addresses why Chiang was unable to win the war and control hyperinflation. Using newly available archival sources, he reveals the critical weakness of Chiang’s style of governing, the fundamental structural flaws in the Nationalist government, bitter personal rivalries and Chiang’s personal lack of interest in finance. This major work of revisionist scholarship will engage all those interested in the shaping of twentieth-century history.”

The Office of the Executive Vice Chancellor has selected a cohort of 19 faculty for its Faculty Leadership in Academia: From Inspiration to Reality program. NUtech Ventures hosted its 2022 Innovator Celebration on 14 Nov. 2022, part of Nebraska Research Days. The annual event featured this year’s Innovator Awards, which recognize university personnel and companies who are developing and commercializing cutting-edge research from Nebraska.

As the university’s technology commercialization affiliate, NUtech Ventures protects, markets, and licenses the university’s intellectual property to improve quality of life and promote economic development. NUtech also promotes entrepreneurship through programming and sponsored events.

The Creative Work of the Year was awarded to The Bell Affair, a documentary film developed by Nebraska scholars: Kwakiiutl Drehr, associate professor of English; Michael Burton, assistant professor of Textiles, Merchandising and Fashion Design; and William Thomas, professor of history, Angle Chair in the Humanities, and associate dean for research and graduate education in the College of Arts and Sciences. This award recognizes an individual or group who has developed a creative innovation, which is typically protected under copyright.

The Bell Affair was directed and filmed remotely, due to travel limitations of the pandemic. These challenges allowed for creative approaches to problem solving to bring the work to fruition. From virtual costume fittings to actors filming themselves, the entire cast and crew contributed uniquely to this project. The result has been the ability to tell the important story of the Bell family: how enslaved people used the court system to gain their freedom… and the impact it had on Nebraska history.

Her essay is "A Review of The 1619 Project and 1619Education.org" under "Exploring 'American' Slavery." The emphasis of her research is in American cultural and intellectual history and African American Studies, with strong interests in race and representation, Atlantic studies, and science studies. Jones is the author of In Search of Brightest Africa: Reimagining the Dark Continent in American Culture, 1884-1936 and is currently writing America in Africa: U.S. Empire, Race, and the African Question, 1847-1919.

One honoree was Laura K. Muñoz, assistant professor, Ethnic Studies and History (pictured below, bottom center). The honorees were recognized during the Women’s History Month Celebration on 10 March 2023 at Lied Center Commons.

The American Historical Association (AHA) was founded in 1884 and chartered by Congress in 1889, and the AHR has been the journal of record for the historical profession in the United States since 1885. In the forum's introduction, editor Mark Philip Bradley and associate editor Fei-Hsien Wang explained that the journal could uniquely offer its global range to the larger discussion of The 1619 Project while inviting historians in fields underrepresented in the journal to engage.

Six students and faculty from the College of Arts and Sciences are among 26 Huskers who received 2023 Women of Courage, Character, and Commitment Awards from the University of Nebraska-Lincoln Women's Center. The annual award honors women from the campus and Lincoln communities who have made positive impacts through professional, personal, mentoring, or peer relationships. Awards coordinated by the Office of the Executive Vice Chancellor have been announced for 2023. These honor faculty and staff who advance the missions of the university in teaching, research, and service. Recipients will be recognized at The Laurels award reception in the fall of 2023.

Nebaska community members enjoyed great food and conversation with some of the brightest minds in the state at Honoring the Future, a fundraiser for Nebraska internships.

This night of dinner and discussion featured table talks on a variety of subjects by esteemed faculty members and an entirely Nebraskan food menu created by Wahadi Allen, executive chef at the University of Nebraska–Lincoln. The fundraiser, co-sponsored by the University Honors Program, Beyond School Bells, a Program of Nebraska Children and Families Foundation; Lincoln Community Foundation; Nebraska Community Foundation; and Union Bank & Trust, was held on 28 Oct. 2022 at the Nebraska Union Platte River Room.

The fundraiser benefited Operation Brain Gain, a campaign at identifying communities throughout the state that need Honors talent. All donations go toward providing internships for students throughout the state so that the best and brightest students see Nebraska as a place where they can intern, innovate, and develop professionally, both now and in the future.

At the event, attendees chose their conversation and table from 10 options, featuring faculty members speaking on their areas of expertise ranging from loneliness and technology to the world's coral reefs. A full list of speakers can be found at https://honors.unl.edu/honors-discussion-event.

The Center for the Southwest at The University of New Mexico publicized the 2023 C. Ruth and Calvin P. Horn Lecture in Western History and Culture, which took place 20 March, 2023 and was free and open to the public. Dr. Katrina Jagodinsky, Susan J. Rosowski Associate Professor of History at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, presented the lecture titled, “The Many Faces of Habeas: Challenging Coercion and Confinement in the American West.”

The lecture emphasized resistance narratives in legal spaces under the theme of habeas corpus, a constitutional protection against wrongful arrest or detention. For thousands of petitioners in the U.S. West between 1812 and 1943, habeas offered an opportunity to challenge wrongful arrest, detention and other inequalities. Jagodinsky’s lecture related the stories of Indigenous people’s use of habeas corpus from Arizona north to Alaska and the Mississippi River west to the Pacific.

The lecture stemmed from a larger initiative that Jagodinsky heads in conjunction with the UNL Center for Digital Research in the Humanities, “Petitioning For Freedom: Habeas Corpus in the American West.” With NSF funding, Jagodinsky and the UNL Center for Digital Research are developing a robust open-source and open-access graph database with data from habeas corpus petitions to demonstrate the relationships of power in claims to freedom and their significance and value within American jurisprudence…

Gender bias on Wikipedia is well documented. When biographies of women make up only 20% of the biographies on the English language Wikipedia site, information gets skewed and misrepresented. University Libraries collaborated with Katrina Jagodinsky, Susan J. Rosowski associate professor of history and graduate chair, and her legal history students to host an event to change that! The event focused on improving the representation of cis and trans women on Wikipedia in the annual Women’s History Month Wikipedia Edit-a-Thon.

All were welcome at this free, public event – from experienced editors to newcomers; people of all gender identities and expressions were welcome to participate. Libraries faculty were on hand to instruct on the steps to being an editor and, as needed, tutorials were provided for Wikipedia newcomers. There were opportunities to edit in both minor and major ways.

“I want to see how many women can improve their Wikipedia page,” said Jagodinsky. “We want women to improve Wikipedia pages on the women they want to see represented.”

Libraries faculty were on hand to instruct on the steps to being an editor and, as needed, tutorials were provided for Wikipedia newcomers. There were opportunities to edit in both minor and major ways.

Gender bias on Wikipedia is well documented. When biographies of women make up only 20% of the biographies on the English language Wikipedia site, information gets skewed and misrepresented. University Libraries collaborated with Katrina Jagodinsky, Susan J. Rosowski associate professor of history and graduate chair, and her legal history students to host an event to change that! The event focused on improving the representation of cis and trans women on Wikipedia in the annual Women’s History Month Wikipedia Edit-a-Thon.

All were welcome at this free, public event – from experienced editors to newcomers; people of all gender identities and expressions were welcome to participate. Libraries faculty were on hand to instruct on the steps to being an editor and, as needed, tutorials were provided for Wikipedia newcomers. There were opportunities to edit in both minor and major ways.

Dr. Katrina Jagodinsky presented a lecture for the American Bar Foundation’s (ABF) speaker series. Her talk offered an overview of the database her NSF-funded team is building in the Center for Digital Research in the Humanities at UNL to discern trends and patterns in marginalized people’s use of habeas in the American West over the long nineteenth century. The project is titled “Petitioning for Freedom: Habeas Corpus in the American West, 1812-1924.” ABF scholars were invited to offer input regarding the encoding structure of the database, and were asked to contribute to a peer review and discussion of an in-progress article focused on early findings of women’s use of habeas.

The ScienceCampus and REAF were delighted that their visiting professor Jeannette Eileen Jones (Nebraska-Lincoln) gave a Brownbag talk on 17 May 2023 titled “Recent Directions and Approaches in Transnational Area Studies.” She addressed recent developments in area studies and global studies, reflecting on how programs in these fields work at her home institution, looking at how interdisciplinary and regional expertise intersects and interacts.

NEW RESEARCH EXPERIENCE HAS HISTORICAL AND LEGAL FOCUS

...AD Banse, a senior at St. Olaf College in Northfield, Minnesota, is one of eight student scholars from across the United States doing historical legal research in the University of Nebraska-Lincoln’s Digital Legal Research Lab, a new research experience for undergraduates. The lab is funded by the National Science Foundation for three years and led by principal investigator Katrina Jagodinsky, Susan Rosowski associate professor and graduate chair in history, and co-principal investigator William G. Thomas, Angle Chair in the Humanities, professor of history and associate dean for research and graduate education in the College of Arts and Sciences.
Students in the program spent the summer transcribing, encoding, and annotating digitized records from habeas corpus petitions and freedom suits, which will be included in the digital humanities projects “Petitioning for Freedom: Habeas Corpus in the American West” and “O Say Can You See: Early Washington, D.C., Law and Family,” respectively. That work, but there’s very little undergraduate training or preparation for that work.”

With that in mind, Jagodinsky said students learn several new skills, including archival research methods, data collection and processing, transcription, and encoding techniques. Additionally, students receive professional development and mentoring…

The research experience ran from 1 June 2022 through 4 Aug. 2022. Students typically spent part of the day in a computer lab in the Center for Digital Research in the Humanities, working with the digitized documents. Lectures, discussions, and readings were also part of the syllabus. The program culminated with a small research fair, where the students presented individual projects they developed…

“Unfortunately, [third generation] heritage speakers often receive criticism of their language abilities from all sides, which they internalize as a personal failing,” said Amelia Tseng, an assistant professor of linguistics and Spanish at American University in Washington, D.C.

"Unfortunately, [third generation] heritage speakers often receive criticism of their language abilities from all sides, which they internalize as a personal failing,” said Amelia Tseng, an assistant professor of linguistics and Spanish at American University in Washington, D.C.

THIRD-GENERATION LATINOS AND LINGUISTIC HERITAGE

For children and grandchildren of immigrants, the message from some inside the community is clear: “You’re not really Latino if you don’t speak Spanish.”

…At school and at home, “English-only” may be drilled into you but eventually, the gatekeeping comes from outside, too. That’s especially true in the workforce, according to Laura K. Muñoz, an assistant professor of history and ethnic studies at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

“Gatekeeping often comes from employers who expect every Latinx to be fluent English and Spanish speakers, which is ironic given the history of English-only and Americanization in our public schools,” the professor told HuffPost.

English-only proponents – and some native Spanish-speaking parents – worry that concurrently learning two languages will hinder kids’ English language acquisition. Research suggests otherwise, though; one 2019 University of Washington study suggested that exposure to multiple languages may make it easier to learn one. For other parents, discouraging their kids from speaking Spanish is a by-product of having been punished for speaking the language in school. If you hear, “This is America, we speak English here” enough times, you’re bound to take the scolding to heart and pass it down to successive generations…

Ultimately, language is only one aspect of cultural identity, said Muñoz.

“If we choose not to teach our children Spanish, but teach them everything else that we believe is relevant, then that’s what matters,” she said. “We get to decide what counts.”

American historian Vicki Ruiz has written that Chicano immigrants and their children “pick, borrow, and retain” elements of their home culture. Muñoz looks at today’s third-gen Latino Americans and sees them doing the exact same thing.

“In a society that has proactively attempted to quash our language and our Latinidad, the fact that we continue to embrace ourselves as Latinxs is what really matters, whether we speak Spanish, English, or both,” she said.

the country.

“We assume that this failure to maintain the language has something to do with us — with the way that we were raised, with the inability of our parents to succeed at teaching Spanish — when in fact there are so many other pressures coming at both the parents and the children,” Muñoz said. “When I think about Spanish language loss, the big word is lástima.”

Preserving the language

For Muñoz, the loss of Spanish makes many Latinos question their own identity. The big question many who have lost their Spanish ask themselves, she said, is, “Am I truly Latino?”

“We believe (Spanish) is a marker of identity because people on the outside are telling us ‘Oh, well, you’re not a true Latino if you don’t speak Spanish.” Muñoz said. “We’ve been in American school systems that have told us ‘Well, you’re not a true American and you don’t speak English.’ So when you’re caught between that sort of rock and a hard place, it makes you question your identity.” …

A Perspective by Paul J. Welch Behringer

Paul Behringer is the University of Nebraska-Lincoln DPAA Research Partner Fellow and a senior fellow at SMU’s Center for Presidential History. He is not an employee of DPAA; he supports DPAA through a partnership. The views presented are those of the author and do not necessarily represent the views of DPAA, DoD, or its components.

After the FBI’s seizure of documents from former president Donald Trump’s Mar-a-Lago estate, many Americans focused for the first time on the rules governing what a former president can do with government documents — especially classified ones. No one knows what Trump’s plans were, but he has tried to argue that he could have declassified information on his way out the door without following any process. “You’re the president of the United States,” he told Sean Hannity on Fox News. “You can declassify just by saying it’s declassified, even by thinking about it.” He’s also attempted to shift the blame by claiming that other presidents took classified documents with them when they left office.

Both theories are demonstrably false. The issue of handling classified information is one that all modern U.S. presidents since Harry S. Truman have grappled with. In Truman’s day, the law was blurry. But he and his successors — working with Congress — refined the law to ensure that handling and preserving government records were not subject to the whims of former presidents. They feared that without an orderly legal process, a president might come along and take classified documents, releasing them to undermine the next administration. The ambiguity that Truman faced gave way to crystal-clear laws that Trump has seemingly violated.

In February 1955, Truman and three aides — an academic, his literary agent, and a trusted adviser — sat down with his former secretary of state, Dean Acheson, for interviews that would help guide the former president as he wrote his memoirs. Truman and his team went on to interview most of the major figures from his administration.

Their first question threw Acheson for a loop. Rather than asking about a big policy decision, the interviewers wondered: What was “the procedure the president would have to follow in clearing documents, such as State Department documents?” It was so technical that Acheson initially misunderstood the question and launched into a soliloquy on how Franklin D. Roosevelt, Truman’s predecessor, “acted on his own” in dealing with heads of state without even consulting the State Department. One of the interviewers quickly interrupted to clarify what they were really asking.

Why start with such an odd question? The reason stemmed from the vast change in the United States during Truman’s administration. The destruction of Europe and Asia during World War II had left the United States as a hegemonic military and economic power. Truman and his Cabinet had to think about rebuilding a devastated world and preventing a third world war. On top of that, they had to manage a spiraling confrontation with the Soviet Union on ideological, political, and economic fronts, which soon threatened to erupt into a nuclear holocaust.

All of this power and all of these problems required a sea change in the way the U.S. government conducted its business. To meet these challenges, the administrative apparatus had to grow. That meant adding thousands of new bureaucrats and experts on top of the explosion in the size of the executive branch that had already taken place during Roosevelt’s presidency. All of this created its own issues: How to manage the tidal wave of paper the government created each day? And, more importantly, how to make sure classified information stayed secret?

It was not a simple problem — and no firm answers had emerged in the decade since the war ended, although Truman had signed the Federal Records Act (FRA) into law in 1950. This law gave the new General Services Administration (GSA) the power to initiate “action through the Attorney General for the recovery of such records as shall have been unlawfully removed,” indicating that officials below the president and vice president couldn’t just keep all of their own documents.
Acheson laid this situation out for Truman and his team. Some issues were clearer than others. If Truman wanted to divulge top-secret information — for example, the size of the U.S. nuclear stockpile in 1950 — he would have to ask for permission from his successor, the Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower. Whether Truman could declassify material himself, well, that was an easy one: “I think it is clear that Mr. Truman cannot do that,” Acheson answered. “He no longer has any authority of any sort. He’s a private citizen now. Anything that is top secret has to be submitted to whoever has the authority to declassify it.”

There were, however, ways to get around classified documents, such as paraphrasing them or describing memories of particular meetings, which might be based on classified notes or other documents. Yet this could get into murky territory.

And Acheson knew precisely where the legal line began to blur, even if his memory was less than perfect. In 1926, his law firm had successfully represented former president Woodrow Wilson’s estate in a case against one of Wilson’s former advisers, “Colonel” Edward M. House. (Acheson apparently misremembered the lawsuit as involving former secretary of state William Jennings Bryan, whose posthumous memoirs came out in 1925, the year before House’s book was published.) House’s book originally contained several letters from Wilson. The court ruled that Wilson’s estate still controlled publication of the letters, and the book had to be reprinted without them. So if Truman had letters from Eisenhower or, say, British Prime Minister Winston Churchill, he’d have to check with them first.

After this explanation, the discussion meandered to whether a former president could even possess classified information. Here again, Acheson was unequivocal, and his answer might surprise readers in 2022: “The pieces of information….” He could still argue in 1955 that he owned his presidential papers.

But if Acheson had to abide by certain rules that his predecessors did not, the same was not true for Truman. He could still argue in 1955 that he owned his presidential papers. Subsequent events, including the rise of the modern surveillance state and Watergate, prodded Congress into amending the FRA several times, however, and passing the Presidential Records Act in 1977. This law gave authority over presidential records to the National Archives and Records Administration, which became its own independent agency in 1984.

It established, once and for all, that “the United States – not the president – shall reserve and retain complete ownership, possession, and control of Presidential records,” and that the national archivist assumed custody of presidential records at the end of each administration. In 2020, perhaps anticipating that Trump might flout convention and the law, NARA released a guide to spell all of this out in plain English.

The situation Truman faced in writing his memoirs was new and, as the conversation with Acheson makes clear, the former president wanted to be careful. Yet his situation illuminates how once again — as has often been the case — it is not that the challenges Trump faces are unprecedented. It’s the extent to which he is willing to break well-established precedent that is itself unprecedented. In this case, however, the law is unambiguous, which is why Trump may now face consequences.

While Acheson chalked up the increased enforcement to partisan bad blood, bruised egos, and cowing to Sen. Joseph McCarthy’s hysteria, he was only partially right. There was also something bigger at stake.

Trust officials to keep their documents safe depended on the personal integrity of former presidents and their cabinets. Was that enough to safeguard state secrets in a time of espionage and incredibly high stakes? That concern had fueled passage of the FRA.

Acheson laid this situation out for Truman and his team. While Acheson chalked up the increased enforcement to partisan bad blood, bruised egos, and cowing to Sen. Joseph McCarthy’s hysteria, he was only partially right. There was also something bigger at stake.

First, she encouraged the graduates to seek new and diverse perspectives, which often requires people to build an inclusive community of friends and colleagues. Seeking out such perspectives allows people to think more critically, creatively, and compassionately to develop solutions to local and global problems, she said.

“Put more broadly: Diversity makes us smarter,” she said. “And so staying ready for lifelong learning and excellence requires us to seek those new and diverse perspectives in our day-to-day lives.”

Jagodinsky told the graduates that they should take risks and prepare to fail in order to grow. She said often the drive to achieve comes from the need to succeed and please others, but this need can be limiting, discouraging innovation and leading people to recycle familiar ideas and practices.

“Occasional failure means you’ve pushed yourself to new limits, that you’re testing new strategies and that you’re avoiding complacency to pursue excellence,” she said.

Jagodinsky urged the graduates to ask “why” every day to avoid losing sight of their personal and professional missions.

“Whether you are at work on a daily goal or a lifetime achievement, a personal or global mission, remembering your ‘why’ will keep you focused and energized over the long term,” she said. “Asking ourselves ‘why’ is important, and so is asking ‘why’ of our organizations, institutions, and associations.”

Finally, Jagodinsky told the graduates to say “yes” when it serves their “why.” Knowing how and when to say “yes” and “no” is a crucial step in realizing one’s potential and recognizing one’s value, she said.

“When you evaluate requests for your time and expertise, consider saying ‘yes’ when it serves your ‘why’,” she said. “But if you can’t connect that request to your ‘why,’ recognize it as someone else’s opportunity and consider nominating a colleague or friend who is able to say ‘yes’ when you need to decline.”

Jagodinsky closed her address by telling the graduates to...
On Holocaust Remembrance Day, a large group of University of Nebraska–Lincoln undergraduates stood quietly and reflected near the Nebraska Holocaust Memorial in Wyuka Cemetery. Following a talk from instructor Gerald Steinacher, Rawley Professor of History, the students walked along the Sea of Stones representing the 11 million murdered during the Holocaust, read the names of victims with Nebraska relatives on the bricks among them, and took in the information from the Wall of Remembrance. Some walked the path through the tree-lined Butterfly Garden, placed in memory of the 1.5 million children who were systematically killed by the Nazis.

Maggie Nielsen, a double major in German and advertising and public relations, said the experience at the memorial was moving, especially because she has her advanced degrees at Nebraska. "You have raised our level of critical thinking and creative activity as a world-leading institution of higher learning, adding to the legacy of the people who have earned their advanced degrees at Nebraska."

The university conferred 1,288 degrees during the ceremonies. The 1,262 graduates are from 50 countries, 41 states, and more than 170 Nebraska communities. The December 2022 graduating class earned seven new Juris Doctor degrees, 327 other new graduate and professional degrees, and 954 new baccalaureate degrees. The university has awarded 312,533 degrees since it was founded in 1869.

Steinacher asked the students afterward to write a reflection as they sat surrounded by the Sea of Stones and looking up to the gleaming metal, concrete, and photos that formed the Star of Remembrance.

Reflections following experiences like this one, and interactions with second-generation survivors, are a key component to the class, History of the Holocaust, as Steinacher has centered the course design on helping students understand and more fully grasp the atrocities as well as what led up to them.

And, with the passage of time, that’s becoming harder, he said.

“We used to be able to bring survivors to class to talk directly with our students and share their stories,” Steinacher said. “That always had an impact by bridging the distance of space and time, but most survivors have now passed away, or are not able to travel because of age or poor health. We’re crossing the bridge between contemporary history – when we can remember things because we lived them – and history, when those who experienced it are no longer here.”

That fact, as well as rising antisemitism and Holocaust distortion, makes this class, and others like it, all the more important. For the last five years, Ari Kohen, Schlesinger Center for Judaic Studies, and a team of Nebraska scholars including Steinacher, have been gathering data on best practices in Holocaust education, with the aim of making courses more meaningful and impactful for students...

In 2020, Kohen and Steinacher published the first article based in the findings of the pilot study. That article caught the attention of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany, based in New York, which has funded the research for four years.

With the funding, Kohen said they will be able to continue the mixed methods approach to learning how to teach about the history of the Holocaust in a way that resonates with students. Students who take the class and opt-in to participate are asked to complete a pre- and post-survey, take part in an interview about the course, and have their written reflections from the class coded and incorporated into the study. With the grant, Kohen said they’ve been able to add research strength to the team, including the addition of expertise from Nebraska’s Methodology and Evaluation Research Core. Kohen also hopes to incorporate alumni of the course into the surveys.

Most of the findings have lined up with the researchers’ hypotheses – that personal narratives and experiences are the most impactful, which can be realized with book choices and adding experiential learning into the syllabus.

“Overwhelmingly, students have mentioned the book The Sunflower (by Simon Wiesenthal), as something that made them think differently,” Kohen said. “There are excellent historical texts on this time period, but they don’t seem to land the same way – it doesn’t stick with them.

“We’ve found there is something really impactful about the field trips, where students have visited a synagogue or the Holocaust Memorial or have had the opportunity to meet and speak with people who are Jewish. It seems like common sense, and things we’ve known as educators, but having quantitative information that shows these things work could help educators design more impactful courses everywhere.”

The funding will help cover costs to host a conference for educators in the future to talk about the findings and how to translate these best practices to both high school and undergraduate college courses. Kohen expects the team to welcome educators for these conferences in the final two years of the grant.
May 2023 but this was the culmination of a long process, as discussed in his article about this accomplishment.

Brett Sheehan prevailed on Coble to complete a new paper which he agreed to do. His chapter, “Preserving the Value of fabi (legal tender) during Nationalist China’s Currency War with Japan,” appeared in the completed volume, published by the University of Hawaii Press in April 2022. This chapter covers a topic not included in Coble’s new book – the currency war between the Chiang Kai-shek government in wartime China and those of puppet governments set up in the occupied areas controlled by the Japanese.

For all of his career at the University of Nebraska, Coble has been a frequent conference attendee. Perhaps because he is the sole historian working on East Asia at the University, he regularly attended such meetings as the Association of Asian Studies and the Midwest Conference on Asian Affairs. All of these in person meetings were brought to a halt by Covid, replaced by Zoom gatherings. During the interim, Coble “attended” conferences in Paris, Hong Kong, and Hawaii – all without leaving his study in Lincoln. Finally, this year he resumed in person meetings. In the fall of 2022, Coble drove to the University of Kansas for the gathering of the Midwest Conference on Asian Affairs. It was such a delight to actually meet scholars in person once again, especially many old friends. Finally in March 2023 he flew to Boston for the national Association for Asian Studies meeting. Ironically, he had been scheduled to attend the conference there in 2019 when it suddenly had to be canceled by the Covid outbreak.

Coble’s teaching experience also made a post-Covid move. Having found himself revising class materials almost daily. The flexibility of Canvas was a major asset in making these changes.

Prof. James A. Garza’s forthcoming book on the environmental history of the Valley of Mexico, under contract to the University of Nebraska Press, discusses how the Mexican government and Pearson and Son, a British transnational engineering firm, helped drain the basin of Mexico in the late nineteenth century. The study discusses the impact of the project on indigenous communities and the environment, offering a unique perspective on how public works development affected rural Mexico during a crucial time in the nation’s history. Garza’s recent chapter “Engineering the Porfirián Landscape: Technology and Social Change in the Basin of Mexico, 1890-1910” offers an introduction to the topic and was published in the edited volume Technocratic Visions: Engineers, Technology, and Society in Mexico, 1876-1946 (University of Pittsburgh Press, 2022) and was edited by Garza and Justin Castro. Garza is also co-editing a new volume with Matthew Esposito, New Directions in Transnational Mexican History: Mexico on the World Stage, in which he and Sarah de la O’s forthcoming book For Wealth and Progress: Spanish Immigrants, Mexican Communities and the Conquest of the Environment in Late Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Century Mexico.” This is forthcoming from Lexington Press in 2024.
Dr. Jennifer Garza continues to teach classes on World War 2, The Cold War, and Recent Russia. She also works at the Saunders County Historical Society and Museum as Assistant Curator. She is publishing a book on the Nebraska Ordnance Plant in Mead that is coming out in summer 2024 with Arcadia Press.

Prof. Vanessa B. Gorman has spent much of the year on pedagogical pursuits, culminating in her appointment by the Executive Vice Chancellor of UNL as the Aaron Douglas Professor for Teaching Excellence. This professorship comes on the heels of her Outstanding Teaching and Instructional Activity Award (OTIA) from President Carter in 2022.

She has pioneered the use of on-line tools to learn classical languages more quickly and with less memorization of obscure forms, as embodied by her course, GREEK 151, Reading Ancient Greek in the Digital Age (available on-line at https://wpormanj.github.io/Greek-Language-Class/).

During her second iteration of the course in spring 2023, she collected copious data from the students with the help of the Bureau of Sociological Research (with funding from both History and Classics), and she intends to write a pedagogical article delving into the advantages and disadvantages of using her innovative method of learning Greek.

She has also reimagined several of her older courses. For example, in fall 2023 she will be offering a new version of HIST/CLAS 412, The Athenian Democracy at War, in which students will debate the crucial issues that faced Athens during the course of the Peloponnesian War, basing their approaches on close readings of such sources as Thucydides, Xenophon, and inscriptions. She is also doing an original preparation of CLAS283/ENGL 240A, The World of Classical Greece.

Gorman is one year into a two-year, $60,000 department teaching grant from the Center for Transformative Teaching (CITT). She has been collaborating with Associate Professor of Practice Ann Trchter, Doctor Angela Bolen, GTO (now Doctor!) Tony Foreman, and Instructional Designer Eyde Olson to develop a series of topical first-year courses that excite young minds while teaching them the skills and tools for effective writing and thinking.

Gorman’s collaborative research on ancient Greek attribution based on digital stylometry has resulted in another article, “A Morpho-Syntactic Authorship Attribution Study of the Speeches of Demosthenes, Apollodorus and Apollonius.” Co-authored with R. J. Gorman, it uses digital measurements to distinguish between true Demosthenic orations and others that were erroneously attributed to him in antiquity. It has been accepted with minor revisions by the Journal of Hellenic Studies, one of the most prestigious Classics journals in the world.

Prof. Margaret D. Jacobs is serving as the Director of the Center for Great Plains Studies. Her research focuses on policies and practices of Indigenous child removal as well as truth and reconciliation. She joined a team of legal experts and historians to submit an amicus brief in the recent Haaland v. Bracken case that threatened to overturn the Indian Child Welfare Act, or ICWA. Her article, “Remembering the Forgotten Child,” was cited in the 2023 majority opinion that preserved ICWA. Jacobs is frequently interviewed about the historical abuses of Indigenous families that led to the passage of ICWA. (https://www.westlaw.com/law-insider.com/latter-day-saints-church-mormon-native-indian-placement-program-icwa-2023-10)

Jacobs also continues to work on Indian boarding schools. The U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum invited Margaret to present the annual Meyerhoff Lecture with philosopher Amad Knowles and education professor Hollie Mackey. The presentation, “Teaching Exclusion in Nazi Germany and the Indian Child Welfare Act,” explored the parallels between the two policies and practices of Indigenous child removal. (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gqMN4mge6pQ)

Jacobs co-directs the Genoa Indian School Digital Reconciliation Project with UNL Libraries professor Liz Lorang and Susanshela Gebiga, a former UNL History Ph.D. student who now teaches at UNO. (https://apnews.com/article/technology-science-health-education-native-americans-86c6055c16316113b52592a46

Building off her 2021 book, After One Hundred Winters: In Search of Reconciliation on America’s Stolen Lands, Jacobs gives many presentations and interviews about how to repair relations between settlers and Indigenous people. The Willamette University History Department invited her to present the Frost Lecture on the university’s annual Founders Day in February 2023.

Jacobs works closely with Kevin Abourezk, a Rosebud Lakota journalist and managing editor at Indianz.com. The two co-direct the Reconciliation Rising multimedia project, which has produced a series of podcasts and an 11-minute film, Return of the Pawnees. Jacobs and Abourezek are working on an hour-long documentary, The Land Returns.

Prof. Gerald J. Steinacher is making good progress on writing his monograph about Nazi war crime trials, the Vatican, and the issue of postwar justice. Steinacher has garnered recognition, as evidenced by numerous invitations to present his findings. Notable events include his talk at the American Society of Church History meeting in Philadelphia and his presentation at the Memorial de la Shoah Museum in Paris. In September 2022, he gave an endowed lecture at the esteemed Divinity School of Harvard University. Furthermore, he was a Visiting Scholar at the Central European University in Vienna, Austria, and the University of Venice in Italy.

Steinacher also has been working with Prof. Ari Kohlen for a number of years on a major research project about how to effectively teach about the Holocaust and other genocides. This research holds particular relevance given the current surge in antisemitism and Holocaust denial, coupled with a prevalent lack of knowledge among individuals in Europe and the Americas, as indicated by recent surveys. Researching the future, this research project has recently received substantial grant support from the Claims Conference in New York.

In March 2023, Steinacher and Kohlen organized the Sommerhauser Symposium on Holocaust Education, titled “Fascisms: Now and Then.” This symposium served as a platform for scholars to discuss and explore crucial topics related to Holocaust education. The conference papers presented at the event will be published in the fourth volume in the series “Contemporary Holocaust Studies,” co-edited with Steinacher and Kohlen, and published by the University of Nebraska Press.

Steinacher remains dedicated to serving the profession and advancing Holocaust studies. He holds a position on the Academic Council of the Holocaust Educational Foundation, which organizes the preeminent conference in Holocaust studies. Furthermore, Steinacher was recently elected as a board member of the Austrian Studies Association, which studies all aspects Austrian, Austro-Hungarian, and Habsburg territory cultural life and history.

Prof. William G. Thomas III worked with co-directors Katrina Jagodinsky and Jeannette Jones to collaboratively develop the U.S. Law and Race Initiative. The project, funded by the Mellon Foundation, will support new courses, graduate research, and fellowship programs over the next three years and include participating faculty from UNL’s College of Law. His recent book (A Question of Freedom: The families who challenged slavery from the nation’s founding to the Civil War) has been adopted for the stage in the Washington, D.C. area. The play, Out of the Vineyard, will open at Joe’s Movement Emporium on 8 September 2023 and run through 24 September 2023. Finally, he continues to collaborate with Animating History partners Kwakiutl Dreher (English) and Micahel Burton (Textiles) to develop standard historical documentary films. Their feature film, The Bill Affair, received the 2022 Creative Work of the Year from NUtech Ventures and is under contract for distribution by Random Media, LLC, a firm that specializes in distributing award-winning independent films. They are working on a new animated short film about Michael Shiner, whose personal handwritten diaries chronicled his life in slavery in Washington, D.C., and documented his successful bid for his family’s freedom. The Diary of Michael Shiner will be released in 2023. Thomas is beginning a new research project on the Dred Scott case in American and world history.

Dr. Paul Behringer joined the Department of History last year as the inaugural Defense POW/MIA Accounting Agency Research Partner Fellow. As part of the postdoctoral fellowship, he works on projects in support of DPAAs mission to identify the remains of Americans who have died in foreign wars (particularly World War II and Korea). In addition, in August 2022 he published an article in the International Journal of Military History and Historiography on U.S. reactions to violence in the Russian Civil War. In November, he also published an op-ed in the Washington Post’s online series Made by History, based on an archival trip to the Truman Library, which compared President Harry Truman’s handling of classified records to President Donald Trump’s. In April 2023, he was invited to present a paper at the University of Maryland’s conference “New Approaches to the Russian Civil War.” In June, at the annual conference of the Society for Historians of American Foreign Relations (S HA FR), he organized a roundtable on “presidential history” and discussed his ongoing oral history project in partnership with the Center for Presidential History at Southern Methodist University. He also chaired and commented on another panel as part of a strong contingent of UNL scholars at SHA FR, thanks to organizing committee co-chair Prof. Jeannette Jones. In the Spring 2023 semester, he taught the undergraduate course U.S. Military History since 1917 and looks forward to teaching it again next spring.

In July 2023, Dr. Cory James Young (pictured above) completed his postdoctoral fellowship at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln. During his time at UNL, Cory was named as a finalist for the Office of Graduate Studies’s Outstanding Postdoc Award and served as project manager for the Digital Legal Research Lab. He would like to thank Katrina Jagodinsky for her stellar mentorship, as well as the rest of the History Department for being so welcoming. In August 2023, he started a new position as Assistant Professor of History at the University of Iowa. Go Big Ten!

Madelina (Lina) Homberger Cordia completed her fourth year in the Ph.D. program in May 2023. She continues to work on her dissertation and wrapped up teaching a U.S. history survey course in the Spring. Through the generous funding provided by two fellowships, the Catherine Prelinger Award from the Coordinating Council for Women in History and the Marguerite C. and Clare McPhee Dissertation Fellowship from the Department of History here at UNL, Lina will be able to dedicate her full attention to completing her dissertation in the following year.

William Kelly is a fourth year Ph.D. student who, during this past academic year, passed his comprehensive exams and successfully defended his prospectus. Now, William’s focus turns towards completing the research and beginning the writing of his dissertation. Additionally, William was awarded a series of fellowships this academic year, including the Stover Fellowship and the Dean’s Fellowship through the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, as well as the Larmore Fellowship through the Maryland Center for History and Culture. Together, this funding will enable William to reveal the lives and strategies of fugitive enslaved people who escaped bondage, fled to British ships, and migrated throughout the British empire during the War of 1812. Aside from his dissertation, William is also the project lead for the Claiming Freedom project under the National Park Service’s Network to Freedom.

Robb Nelson was recently promoted to the position of Curator of Stuhr Museum in Grand Island, NE. He started working at Stuhr Museum in 2019 as the Assistant Curator. This new role is the highest-ranking historian position at that institution.

Pablo Rangel is showcased in a newly released documentary on the National Geographic channel titled, What Really Happened: America’s Wild West, the True Story of the Making of Early America. He appears in Episode 5, “The Wild West: Building Pacific Railroads and Birth of the Cowboy.” You can find the show at this link: https://www.nationalgeographic.com/tv/shows/what-really-happened-americas-wild-west.

Last fall, Dr. Joseph Locke, book review editor of The Journal of the Gilded Age and Progressive Era, asked Ann Vlock to provide a book review of Gregg Cantrell’s The People’s Revolt: Texas Populists and the Roots of American Liberalism. Her review has been published in the most recent issue of this journal, volume 22 no 2 (April 2023).

Andrea Wagh completed her second year in the M.A.-Ph.D. program, capping off the 2022-23 year by successfully defending her portfolio and earning a M.A. in history. She will begin her third year in the Ph.D. program this fall.

In May 2023, Andrea traveled to Paris, France to conduct research at the Memoria de la Shoah and received valuable materials that will aid her current research project on the experiences of Jewish children who were hidden by the Oeuvre de Secours aux Enfants during the Holocaust. The trip was made possible by the Maslowsky Travel Award.

The rest of her summer was filled attending professional opportunities such as the Max M. Kaplan Summer Institute at Holocaust Museum Houston and the Zoryan Institute’s Genocide and Human Rights University Program (GHRUP) at the University of Toronto. GHRUP is a two-week course that introduces graduate students to the larger field of genocide studies through in-depth examinations of comparative genocide case studies led by major scholars in the field.

Doctoral Degrees Awarded

In May 2023, the Department of History awarded four doctoral degrees. Congratulations to our Ph.D. graduates on their major accomplishment!

Starting this fall, E. Bryan Cooper Owens will be a lecturer in the Africana Studies Institute at UConn.

In the past year, Elodie Galeazzi-Kelly taught HIST 111 for the second time and refined the outline of her dissertation. She focused her research on Black radio in Omaha, KOWH AM and FM. She conducted research at the Great Plains Historical Society, and collaborated with the Great Plains Black History Museum to use their unindexed archives. She had the opportunity to interview several people who were involved in the radio project, including Dr. Rodney Wead, Mel Luetchens, and Dr. Don Breidhauer. In the coming year, Elodie will serve as the Mellon US Law & Race Initiative research assistant.

For a quartet of graduate students, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln’s Digital Humanities Fellowship was challenging, collaborative, expansive, invigorating, and transformative experience.

Nebraska’s Ethan Jensen (geography), Patrick Hoehne (history), Olufunke Ogundimu (English), and Kevin Pflager, a masters student in geography, all agree that the collaborative environment of the program was essential to accelerate the development of their projects…

Patrick Hoehne’s project uses machine learning to expose and explore bias in Civil War-era newspapers, and has benefited from the use of the supercomputer provided by the Holland Computing Center. He uploaded full-text files of hundreds of thousands of newspaper articles from both the Richmond Daily Dispatch and The New York Times and ran a code to train the model going through the massive text file. He has run 100,000 training steps with the goal to reach a million.

“The output gets tighter the more I train the model, and I hope to make an engaging website where users can put in any prompt text, like abstract words such as heroism, tragedy, monster, and see the different results from the northern paper versus the southern paper,” Hoehne said…

In the latter six weeks of the fellowship, the students pursued their project goals independently, supported by weekly mentoring sessions with Heitman. In the fall of 2022, they shared aspects of their learning experience and project results at the first Digital Humanities Afternoons forum event.

DIGITAL HUMANITIES FELLOWSHIPS FOSTER TRANSFORMATION

RESEARCH DAYS WINNERS
More than 130 graduate students and 200 undergraduate students participated in these sessions in addition to a week-long celebration of student research and creative activity. Graduate students who were awarded competitive prizes for their scholarship and presentation skills received $400 toward travel grants to present their research regionally or nationally as well as support other research costs.

Nearly 100 faculty, postdoc, and graduate student volunteer judges met with students during morning and afternoon sessions and evaluated their presentations.

A story of Black achievement, struggle, persistence, and risk-taking.

That’s how Rick Edwards describes his upcoming book, The First Migrants. The culmination of years of research, First Migrants tells the stories of Black homesteaders’ quest for land and freedom in Nebraska and across the Great Plains after post-Civil War reconstruction failed in the South.

In the book, which will be published by the University of Nebraska Press in August 2023, Edwards and co-author Jacob Friefeld [UNL History Ph.D., May 2016] tell this “mostly unknown chapter of Black History and homesteading.”

When slavery was abolished with the passage of the 13th Amendment in 1865, there was hope and a widespread belief that Black people would be given land in the South – a deal commonly referenced with the phrase “40 acres and a mule.”

Despite the bleak outlook, some saw opportunity in the Great Plains, where homesteading promised the potential for 160 acres in exchange for five years of working and living on the land.

Every state across the Great Plains would be home to Black homesteaders. And about 3,500 of those pioneers made homestead claims and gained ownership of some 650,000 total acres.

The idea for The First Migrants came from a request from the National Park Service for a project on Black homesteaders. During five years of work, Edwards and his team studied records and interviewed the descendants of Black homesteaders to form the story told in the book…

IN MEMORIAM:

JOHN WUNDER

John Wunder, professor emeritus in the Department of History, passed away 25 June 2023 at age 78.

Wunder was born 7 Jan. 1945, in Vinton, Iowa, and grew up in Dysart, Iowa. Wunder earned a law degree in 1970 from the University of Iowa, where he had previously received his bachelor’s and master’s, and his Ph.D. in 1974 from the University of Washington. He arrived at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln in 1988 to serve as director of the Center for Great Plains Studies (CGPS) until 1997. He also served as an associate dean in the College of Arts and Sciences Dean’s Office and president of the Mari Sandoz Heritage Society and the Western History Association.

Wunder’s academic interests ranged from the American West and Native American history to the history of Nebraska and the development of six-man football. He authored or edited more than 20 books and numerous essays and articles on topics such as the Great Plains and American legal history. Retained by the People: A History of American Indians and the Bill of Rights won Phi Alpha Theta’s award for the best history book in 1995.

In 2016, CGPS opened the Wunder Book Collection, scholarly works about the Great Plains and Natives in the Plains donated by Wunder.

Among other accolades, he received the 2021 Sower Award in the Humanities from Humanities Nebraska for his contribution to the public understanding of the humanities and the university's Annis Chaikin Sorenson Award for Outstanding Teacher in 1994. He was the first professor from UNL to be selected to hold the Fulbright Bicentennial Chair in American Studies in Finland.

He is survived by: Susan, his wife of 53 years; daughters, Nell and Amanda; son-in-law, Shamus Adams; and grandson, Anders Wunder Adams.

A gathering to remember Wunder will be held early in the fall semester.

Memorials are suggested to the Chief Standing Bear Journey for Justice Scholarship Fund.
